Over the last year I've been working with images pushed from one form to the next. Each image begins as a small drawing in black ink, but slowly the white of the page becomes the impetus to imagine how each image can make contact with its inherent psychological content... whether its narrative evolution requires the colors and optical possibilities of painting, the architectural scale of the wall, the transparency afforded by plexiglass, or the flood of light emanating from neon. The image is fugitive, yet declarative; insistent, yet unstable.

The subject of two paintings here, the red figure from "Black Dime//Late Spring" and her blue reflection that appears in "Call from Psyche" are both extensions of a recent wall painting "Screen Test in Agony's Garden". The shape of her severe, jagged body is indeed a fifth or sixth generation distortion of a landscape. As this new woman appeared she became entwined in my thinking with an image I recently discovered of Jacques-Louis David's "Psyche Abandoned", depicting Psyche just moments after she has been deserted by Cupid. In her grief she looms large over the painting, dwarfing the ocean and hillside behind her.

In the process of trying to push images forward, I keep finding myself looped in reverse, linking up with images and figures from the past. I've decided to leave this door open and let these narrative lines sync up with my own. Psyche's mythology casts her as the mortal form of the Soul-- the very source of a conception of the self "out-of-body". These loose associative threads wrapped up around images of lust, loss, and betrayal, developed into the main theme of this new work-- the entrance of a ghost -- a figure that appears in defiance of time, in a body that moves between mediums, and vanishes.
